YTJ™ YOUTH TRANSFORMING JUSTICE

WHERE SECOND CHANCES COME FIRST

Impact Report 2026

Where second chances come first

Youth Transforming Justice (YTJ) works to end the school-to-prison pipeline by replacing punitive school discipline and juvenile justice responses with restorative, trauma-informed, and youth-led approaches.

In partnership with Marin County Probation, San Rafael City Schools, and Novato Unified School District.

MARIN COUNTY PROBATION DEPARTMENT

SR SAN RAFAEL CITY SCHOOLS

NOVATO UNIFIED SCHOOL DISTRICT

Our mission:

Youth Transforming Justice (YTJ) partners with young people, schools, and juvenile probation to replace punitive discipline and justice responses with restorative, youth-centered approaches.

We address harm through accountability and repair, keep young people connected to school and community, and prevent deeper involvement in the justice system.

With your support, young people stay in school, not in the justice system.

1. Interrupt the cycle

YTJ intervenes at the point where a suspension, expulsion, or court referral would otherwise happen. Instead of being removed from school or pushed into the system, young people are referred to a restorative, peer-led process.

2. Repair harm and build accountability

Young people work directly with peers to understand the impact of their actions and rebuild trust within their school community.

3. Youth lead and grow

Trained youth Peer Leaders facilitate restorative processes, guide conversations, and support their peers in completing individualized restorative plans. Young people are not treated as problems to be punished, but as individuals capable of accountability and leadership.

4. Stay connected to school and community

Rather than being sent home or cited into the justice system, students remain engaged in school while addressing the issue that led to the incident. This reduces repeat referrals, lowers recidivism, and keeps young people on track academically and socially.

With the support of YTJ, a young person is more likely to:

- Stay in school and avoid suspension or expulsion
- Avoid entry into the juvenile justice system
- Take accountability and repair harm through restorative practices

- Reduce repeat incidents and negative behavior patterns
- Build confidence, resilience, and a sense of purpose
- Build lasting connections to peers, mentors, and supportive adults

Oliver's Story:

In 2025, Oliver's growth was clear as he moved from being a young person supported by YTJ to someone actively leading and giving back to his community. Over the course of the year, he was recognized with both the Center for Volunteer and Nonprofit Leadership Youth of the Year Award and the Marin Community Clinics Youth of the Year Award. These honors reflected not only his service hours, but the character, responsibility, and initiative he demonstrated as he stepped into leadership roles.

Oliver also helped found a new youth-led initiative, Heart-Safe Marin, alongside fellow Novato High School students. The project aims to address emergency readiness gaps by placing AEDs and medical kits in community spaces across Marin County, particularly in underserved areas. Oliver reached out to YTJ not for funding, but to invite partnership and endorsement, writing that his experience with YTJ "has shaped how I think and view community safety and prevention" and that he wanted to continue that work by creating opportunities to protect others.

The shift in 2025 was about ownership. Oliver was no longer simply participating in programs. He was applying what he had learned about accountability, prevention, and community responsibility to design solutions of his own and mobilize others around them. He began identifying needs, communicating with community organizations, and helping lead an effort to raise significant support for a cause he believed in.

Oliver reflected on what the experience meant to him: "YTJ gave me a place to grow into someone I respect."

His story shows what YTJ hopes for every young person we serve: the confidence to lead, the skills to act, and the belief that they can create safer, stronger communities themselves.

School Suspension Alternatives

When a student gets in trouble at school or is cited into the justice system, the standard response is punishment. Suspension. A court date. Removal from the classroom and the community where they need to be.

YTJ partners with schools to do something different. Instead of removal, students are referred to a structured, peer-led process on campus. Students work alongside trained peers to reflect on what happened, understand who was affected, and make things right through individualized restorative plans.

Students stay in school. They stay engaged in their education. And the issues that led to the incident are actually addressed, not deferred.

With your support, School Suspension Alternatives keep students connected to school, to their peers, and to the adults who can help them move forward.

Replacing suspension with accountability and repair.

Peer Solutions/ Youth Training Youth

Young people listen to each other in ways adults often cannot. That is not a philosophy. It is what we have watched happen for more than twenty years in Marin County schools.

Too often, young people facing challenges at school are met first with punishment instead of support. They are suspended, pulled from the classroom, and separated from the communities and relationships that are critical to their growth.

YTJ does something different. The student sits down with a team of trained youth their own age. Not administrators. Not a judge. Their peers. Together they talk through what happened, who was affected, and what needs to be made right. The student takes responsibility, makes a plan, and follows through.

It works. Since 2004, YTJ has worked with more than 2,000 young people in Marin County. Our recidivism rate has remained at 7%, with the vast majority of participating youth avoiding further system involvement. And some of the youth who once sat on the other side of that table now run it. Our North Marin Site Coordinator was a YTJ participant as a teenager. He completed college and came back to serve the community he grew up in.

Since its inception in 2004, the YTJ model has diverted over 2000 Marin County youth from the traditional juvenile justice system.

Peer-led programs succeed.

School Wellness Groups

Not every young person who needs support has gotten into trouble yet. Many are just carrying more than they should have to carry at their age, and they don't have a place to process it.

"School Wellness Groups meet students at the moment when support can still make a difference. Instead of waiting for a crisis, YTJ creates space for students to build the skills and connections they need to stay engaged in school and move forward."

— Carmen Diaz Ghysels,
Superintendent, San Rafael City Schools

School Wellness Groups reach those students before a difficult moment becomes a crisis. Groups of eight students meet weekly across a 27-week program on campus. The small group size is intentional. With eight students, every person in the room is known, heard, and accountable to the group. It is not a classroom. It is a community.

Sessions are facilitated by YTJ's bilingual restorative justice coordinators in coordination with school counselors. These are members of the communities they serve, delivering the program in English and Spanish to students whose families may not otherwise have access to this kind of support. Sessions focus on emotional regulation, coping skills, resilience, and healthy peer relationships through guided discussion, structured activities, and reflection.

With your support, this work reaches young people at the moment when prevention is still possible.

Fentanyl & Overdose Prevention

Youth Transforming Justice addresses the growing threat of fentanyl through novel, practical, life-saving approaches. At a time when a single mistake can have irreversible consequences, access to accurate information and peer support has never been more critical. Through near-peer education and prevention trainings at schools including Marin Catholic, Branson, and Marin Community School, YTJ equips young people with the knowledge and tools they need to make smarter decisions in real-world situations. These sessions are grounded in honesty, relevance, and trust, so students are more likely to listen, engage, and retain the critical life-saving lessons they learn.

In these trainings, youth gain a very clear understanding of fentanyl and overdose risks, learn to recognize the signs of an overdose, and know how to respond in an emergency. Just as importantly, they build the confidence to look out for one another, fostering a culture of accountability, responsibility, and shared commitment among peers.

YTJ's harm reduction work helps young people protect themselves and each other before a crisis occurs. By providing young people with accurate information and practical, life-saving skills, we empower them to protect themselves and others, turning knowledge into action and awareness into impact.

Substance Safety Skills Harm Reduction Training

When a young person gets caught with drugs or alcohol, the standard response is punishment. A citation. A court date. A lecture about making better choices. None of that addresses what is actually happening in their life, and none of it prepares them for the next time they face a dangerous situation.

Substance Safety Skills Harm Reduction Training takes a different approach. The program includes four sessions: a Saturday family session and three weekday evening teen sessions. All sessions are confidential and non-judgmental by agreement.

The Saturday session brings youth and their parents or caregivers together for an honest conversation about Marin's substance landscape. Not a lecture. Not a shame session. The parents reflect on their own risk-taking years, while youth discuss what they observe among their peers. Two guest speakers join the discussion: a parent who lost a child to drugs and a young person in recovery. Youth leave with a pledge to help protect their friends' lives. The three teen-only evening sessions go further. Participants learn the neuroscience of adolescent risk-taking, their legal rights, and how to examine their relationship with substances. Safety scenarios are central to every session: how to take car keys from someone who should not be driving, what to do if someone overdoses, how to access emergency help and receive immunity from prosecution, and how to protect peers from substance-driven harm.

The program mixes harm reduction, restorative practices, and adolescent brain science to help youth make safer decisions in real-world situations. Delivered by YTJ's bilingual coordinators, it is built for the reality that young people need skills, not just warnings.

96% of referred youth complete all four sessions in the Substance Safety Skills Harm Reduction Training program.

San Rafael to Novato Expansion (Probation Partnership)

In May 2024, eight students at Sinaloa Middle School in Novato were arrested on felony assault charges after a planned attack on a fellow student. The incident shook the school and the broader community. Parents packed the school that week, some saying their children were afraid to come to school. A teacher with nearly three decades in the district, Liz Nelson, stood up and said, “We’re working so hard, all day long, sitting in circles, seeing what we can do. We need you to help us.”

That moment made clear what was missing.

> “By prioritizing early intervention and school-based coordination, this work helps students receive support before challenges escalate.”

> Superintendent, Novato Unified School District

In late 2025, Youth Transforming Justice launched in the Novato Unified School District at Novato High School, Sinaloa Middle School, and Hamilton TK-8. This was not a pilot or a new experiment. It was the expansion of a model that had already been working in San Rafael for years.

Marin County Probation funded the expansion after seeing the impact of YTJ’s work in San Rafael. Novato Unified School District leadership supported the partnership and brought YTJ in to work directly with school sites. Together, they chose an approach focused on early intervention, accountability, and keeping students connected to school rather than pushing them further into the justice system.

> “A key part of improving outcomes is ensuring that youth are identified earlier and connected to appropriate supports in school and community settings.”
> — *Marlon J. Washington,
> Chief Probation Officer, Marin County

YTJ has worked with more than 2,000 young people in Marin County since 2004. The same restorative, peer-led approach that has reduced recidivism and kept San Rafael students connected to school is now in place in North Marin, reaching students who previously did not have access to this kind of support.

With your support, this work continues to grow. More schools. More students. More young people in Marin County who have a real alternative to suspension, expulsion, and the justice system.

In Memory of Chief Marlon Washington

Youth Transforming Justice honors the life and legacy of Marin County Chief Probation Officer Marlon Washington. His commitment to young people, restorative justice, and creating opportunities for youth to thrive made a lasting difference in our community. We are grateful for his leadership, partnership, and belief in the potential of every young person.

A message from our Founder and Executive Director:

Dear Friends,

2025 was a year of continued growth and stronger alignment with our core partners across Marin County.

In San Rafael, our work with San Rafael City Schools and Marin County Probation continued to provide a consistent alternative to suspension and system involvement. Students were referred to our programs in real time, often at the point where a disciplinary decision or citation would otherwise have been made. That day-to-day integration is what makes this work effective.

That foundation made it possible to expand into North Marin, where we began working with Novato Unified School District. Students in Novato now have access to the same model that has been in place in San Rafael for years.

In 2025, we worked with 256 young people across Marin County and diverted 60 suspensions during the school year. Students led Peer Solutions, sitting across from their peers and working through situations that would otherwise have resulted in removal from school or further system involvement. School Suspension Alternatives kept students engaged rather than sending them home. In our Wellness Groups, young people built the ability to manage stress and ask for help before issues escalated. Through our harm reduction work, high school students led direct conversations with younger students about fentanyl and overdose risk.

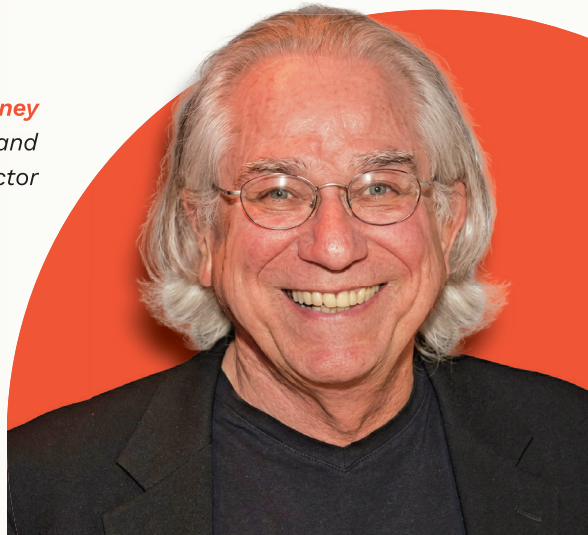

This work depends on trust from school leaders, probation, and the broader community. It is built over time by showing up consistently and doing the work the right way.

Over the past twenty years, we have worked with more than 2,000 young people in Marin County. That consistency matters, especially as the need for effective, community-based alternatives continues to grow.

None of this happens without the strength of these partnerships or the support of those who invest in this work.

Thank you for being part of it.

Where second chances come first is not an idea. It is a system that works.

In 2025, 256 young people stayed in school, repaired harm, and avoided deeper involvement in the justice system. Some, like Oliver, went on to lead in their communities and create change of their own.

That work is now expanding. More schools. More students. More moments where a different response is possible.

Every referral is a decision point. Punishment or accountability. Removal or connection. A record or a second chance.

Your support determines which path a young person takes.

Donate today and help keep young people in school, in their communities, and out of the justice system.
